Columbia College esports team member BJ Blahnik, shown, receives Steve Ross, captain of his play "League of Legends" during a game practice at the gym. The team finished the "League of Legends" season undefeated and ranked within the top 15 college esports teams.

It's a place where the world of esports is in full swing. The room is dimly lit, with the glow of computer monitors illuminating the faces of students. They are all focused on their screens, their hands moving quickly over keyboards and mice. This is the world of esports, a competitive scene that has grown rapidly in popularity in recent years.

At Columbia College, students are not just playing games; they are competing for scholarships. The "League of Legends" team, led by captain Steve Ross, is one of the top teams in the country. They have won several tournaments and are currently ranked within the top 15 college esports teams.

The team's success is a testament to the hard work and dedication of its members. They spend hours each day practicing and competing, striving to be the best. Their goal is to win the "League of Legends" World Championship, the most prestigious tournament in the world.

For many of the team members, esports is more than just a game. It is a way of life. They have formed strong bonds with their teammates and are proud to represent Columbia College. They are also looking forward to the future, where esports is expected to become a mainstream sport.

UM SYSTEM Nontenure-track faculty more at risk for layoffs

Most MU nontenure-track staff are on one-year contracts that have to be renewed each year

BY ANDREW KESSEL

The University of Missouri System is facing a difficult financial situation, and the result could be the loss of many nontenure-track faculty members. The university's budget is in a state of crisis, and many nontenure-track faculty members are on one-year contracts that have to be renewed each year.

The university's financial situation is the result of a combination of factors, including a decline in state funding and a need to cut costs. The university's leadership is looking for ways to reduce expenses, and nontenure-track faculty members are being targeted for layoffs.

The university's financial situation is a serious concern for many nontenure-track faculty members. They are on one-year contracts that have to be renewed each year, and they are not guaranteed a second year. This makes their future uncertain, and they are looking for ways to protect their jobs.
